A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT

From the director and star of Amélie (Jean-Pierre Jeunet and Audrey Tautou) comes a very different love story: A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT. Based on the acclaimed novel by Sebastien Japrisot, the adapted screenplay was written by Jeunet & Guillaume Laurant.

As World War I draws to an end, a young French woman's greatest fight is about to begin. Mathilde has received word that her fiancé Manech is one of five wounded soldiers who have been court-martialed and pushed out into the no-man's land between the French and German armies... and almost certain death.

Unwilling to accept that her beloved Manech is lost to her forever, Mathilde embarks on an extraordinary journey to discover the fate of her lover. At each turn, she receives a different heartbreaking variation on how Manech must have spent those last days, those last moments. Still, she never gets discouraged.

If Manech were dead, Mathilde would know.

With a steadfast faith, strengthened by hope and a stubbornly cheerful disposition, Mathilde follows her investigation to its conclusion, convincing those who might help her and ignoring those who will not. As she draws closer to the truth about the five unfortunate soldiers and their brutal punishment, she is drawn deeper into the horrors of war and the indelible marks it leaves on those whose lives it has touched.

A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT stars Audrey Tautou, Gaspard Ulliel, Jean-Pierre Becker, Dominique Bettenfeld, Clovis Cornillac, Marion Cotillard, Jean-Pierre Darroussin, Julie Depardieu, Jean-Claude Dreyfus, André Dussollier, Ticky Holgado, Tcheky Karyo, Jérôme Kircher, Denis Lavant, Chantal Neuwirth, Dominique Pinon, Jean-Paul Rouve and Michel Vuillermoz.

Directed by Jean-Pierre Jeunet, from a screenplay adapted by Jeunet and Guillaume Laurant, with dialogue by Laurant, the film was shot by Bruno Delbonnel, A.F.C. Aline Bonetto served as set designer; Madeline Fontaine as Costume Designer. The film was edited by Herve Schneid, A.C.E. Music by Angelo Badalamenti.

Warner Independent Pictures will release the film in New York and Los Angeles on NOVEMBER 26, 2004

ABOUT THE PRODUCTION

Once upon a time, there were five French soldiers who had gone off to war, because that's the way of the world.

-- Sébastien Japrisot, A Very Long Engagement

One of the most ambitious and unusual projects in French cinema, A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT is the realization of a 10-year-old dream for director Jean-Pierre Jeunet. Upon reading Sébastien Japrisot's novel in 1991, Jeunet was thoroughly enthralled by the extraordinary love story – and its heroine Mathilde – and dreamt of adapting it for the screen.

“The first time I opened it, I couldn't put it down until I'd finished it,” he recounts. “First, it's a very, very lovely, strong and original story about this young woman who refuses to accept that her lover's dead, despite all the evidence. Second, I found many of my own preoccupations and interests in it, like the 1914-18 War and Paris in the 20s. A blend of innocence and fantasy impregnates the whole period despite the gravity of events.”

Jeunet found the main character's determination to be especially compelling. Says Jeunet, “It all comes down to that. The epigraph to Japrisot's book is a quote from Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland...The ability that some have to see what others can't see or, more importantly, to not look at what all the world sees, is something that moves me deeply. Mathilde is deeply convinced she is right, despite what everyone else thinks. She finds herself alone against the world. And even if she has moments of doubt, she finds the strength to convince the others and win them over. I deeply understand this ferocious willpower and obstinacy. It's similar to someone who wants to make films but comes from a background that completely discourages it.”

At the time, Jeunet had just shot his first feature Delicatessen. When the relatively unknown director learned that Warner held the rights to the book, he put this particular dream on hold, continuing on his own wildly imaginative path as a filmmaker.

Ten years later, the worldwide success of Amélie had definitely altered his situation. Jeunet learned that Warner still held the rights and now planned to make a film of the story. His desire to adapt Japrisot's book was rekindled and his passion for the project had, in fact, become even more pronounced since he had finally met the ideal actress for the part of Mathilde: Audrey Tautou.

“When I first read the book, I wondered who could play Mathilde but couldn't think of anyone. When I met Audrey I immediately thought, ‘Here's Mathilde, standing right in front of me.’” On the evening of the Oscars® ceremony (where Amélie was nominated for Best Foreign Film, Best Screenplay, Best Photography and Best Art Direction), he asked his Amélie if she would like to do another film with him. She replied: “Sure, if it's with the same crew!” This only convinced Jeunet all the more. He resolved that A Very Long Engagement would be shot in France, in French and with French actors and French crew. Warner accepted. Gaining 35% of its funding from Warner French and International distribution and video, the film would be produced by 2003 Productions – a French production company created by Francis Boespflug, in which Warner holds a minority capital interest. The two companies had already co-produced two films: Josiane Balasko's L'ex-femme de ma vie and Charles Nemes' Le Carton. Thus, the dream began the process of becoming reality.

While funding was being organized, the director began adapting the novel, collaborating with Amélie scriptwriter, Guillaume Laurant. "It's a breathless novel," comments Laurant. "Japrisot's way of carrying us along right to the end is really captivating...[We were primarily concerned with] capturing the subtle balance between this light-filled love story and its horrific context. What's so beautiful about A Very Long Engagement is that the heroine's tenacity, strength of will and faith transcend the horrors of war."

Jeunet and Laurant worked tirelessly to uncover the simple story to be found at the very core of the sweeping novel, in order to keep the ambitious project focused on the heroine's journey throughout the film. "Our first task was to take this ultra-sophisticated machine apart, like dismantling an engine into its separate components to see how it works," Jeunet explains.

Laurant elaborates, "First we worked together to agree on what had to be kept and what discarded and decide upon a structure. Then Jean-Pierre wrote a 30-page synopsis. On the basis of that, I wrote a first version of the script. After that, it was a constant to-and-fro between myself and Jean-Pierre until we came up with a final version. I really enjoyed working with Jean-Pierre because of his constant concern for simplicity and efficiency."

In adapting the novel, the writers also had to make some difficult decisions in creating a more cinematic version of the story. In particular, Jeunet and Laurant had to find a way to translate the epistolary parts of the book into the immediacy of film. While a classic literary device, the use of letters sent and received by Mathilde in the course of her inquiry can be particularly difficult to adapt.

"We kept some letters but poeticized them visually," says Jeunet. "And we transformed many into actual meetings between Mathilde and the other person. In movies, you really need a little more efficiency and spectacle without going over the top. I also took the opportunity (I couldn't resist) to introduce a few of my personal ideas along the way. Let's say that Mathilde is a bit more active in the film and spends less time reading than in the book."

The writers also made another difficult decision to alter another important aspect of the book. They decided that Mathilde would not be in a wheelchair but, as a victim of poliomyelitis, she would limp. "In the novel, the reader ends up forgetting about the wheelchair," notes Jeunet, "however, on screen...it would end up being too heavy. It would also have been cumbersome in terms of the production, and I wanted to be as free as possible."

Together, director and screenwriter polished the script over several months. "Our work was very different from that on Amélie," says Laurant. "Amélie was a completely original script. Jean-Pierre and I threw our ideas onto the table and constructed the film from there. Here, we started with a defined story, with twists and turns and genuine intrigue. Our starting point was specific characters that evolve and have emotions."

All this writing work took place with Sébastien Japrisot's blessing. Jeunet had explained to him what he was going to do. "Unfortunately, I didn't have time to meet him," says Jeunet. "When we spoke, he said, 'Now it's your baby. Do it as you see fit. But come and see me after you've finished.' Alas, he died a week before the script was finished. I was sad about that."

Along the way, Jeunet and Laurant did an enormous amount of research, reading novels and period accounts. Jeunet's childhood fascination with the subject provided an excellent starting point in the exhaustive quest.

Says Jeunet, "It's a strange thing. Although I grew up in Lorraine, I wasn't brought up on stories of that period. None of my family members were directly involved in the war, so they didn't pass on their stories to me. But as an adolescent, I would voraciously read everything on the subject: Les Croix de Bois, Le Feu, La Peur, Orage d'Acier...but this war was a total abomination. When people talk of WWI and, even more atrociously, of those who were shot 'as an example,' you can only condemn that war – and all wars, for that matter."

The writers researched images to help them imagine the world as Mathilde might have known it in order to recreate it in the script, relying not so much on films ("There aren't many good ones, other than Kubrick's Paths of Glory and Lewis Milestone's All Quiet on the Western Front," says Jeunet) as news reports and period documents. "For Jean-Pierre, it is extremely important to get every detail right," says Laurant. "We needed to get a visual feeling for all the novel's nooks and crannies and the situations that Japrisot describes. So we had to do a lot of research, to get as close as possible to reality."

Ever since she learned of his death, she has stubbornly held to her intuition, like to that thin wire. Each time it snaps, she ties it again. She never gets discouraged. And Mathilde has a cheerful disposition. She tells herself that if the wire won't lead her to her lover...it's no problem. She can always use it to hang herself.

Upon completion of the script, the first person cast was also one of the first people to read it. Tautou says, "What touched me immediately was Mathilde's determination. Although everything seems to indicate that her quest is impossible, she continues to believe in it totally. Personally, I wouldn't have been able to battle on in the way she does."

On the story's broader message, Tautou comments, "It's a love story about two people who are separated by the war. The power of the film comes from the relationship between Mathilde's tenacity – she'll do anything to find her lover, who everybody thinks is dead – and the brutality of the historical context. There's nothing maudlin or gratuitous in the feelings that are portrayed. Through this love story, we can understand the horror and the infamy of this war."

Upon completion of the screenplay, Jeunet began assembling an eclectic, surprising cast for the film. He brought together a diverse group of actors with different approaches, blending experience and techniques. He also sought out distinctive faces, personalities and temperaments.

“I did what I always do,” says the director. “I looked for the actors I thought would best play the characters, without trying for a glittering cast. This time was different, because my experience and success with Amélie meant I could have aces, even for the small roles.” While Audrey Tautou is backed up by some of Jeunet’s regulars, including Dominique Pinon, Ticky Holgado, Jean-Claude Dreyfus and Urbain Cancelier, there were also a lot of new faces. These include Clovis Cornillac, Marion Cotillard, Jean-Pierre Darroussin, Julie Depardieu, André Dussollier (who did the voice-over for Amélie), Tchéky Karyo, Jérôme Kircher, Denis Lavant and Jean-Paul Rouve.

*The fifth man was a Cornflower, nickname for the class of 1917.
He wasn’t twenty yet. Now, he was afraid of everything; cannons, gas, trench sweepers, executions. Before the slaughter, he was just the opposite, braving storms in rescue operations...*

In searching for the right actor to play the role of Manech, Jeunet auditioned numerous young French actors, but when he spotted Gaspard Ulliel in Michel Blanc’s film Summer Things, the director knew he’d found Mathilde’s lover. “There’s something about Gaspard,” says Jeunet. “The camera loves him. He’s a wild one, but he’s got a sense of timing and always hits the right note. He’s absolute magic. He and Audrey make an ideal couple, both innocent and romantic – the very couple whose love story pervades the film.”

While casting the film, Jeunet was also assembling his production team, enlisting the aid of frequent collaborators and longtime colleagues, most of whom have actually been with him since he started out. To shoot the film, Jeunet recruited cinematographer Bruno Delbonnel, with whom he made his short films as well as Amélie. He also selected set designer Aline Bonetto (who has worked with him since Delicatessen), costume designer Madeline Fontaine (who met him on The City of Lost Children), make-up artist Nathalie Tissier, editor Hervé Schneid, special-effects company Les Versaillais and visual effects company Duboi. All enjoyed both the pleasure of coming together again after the fabulous Amélie adventure to face the excitement of the challenge that awaited them.

*ESPERANZA: Shall I spare you the rest?
MATHILDE:
Tell me what happened.*

In preparing for the shoot, Jeunet worked closely with set decorator Bonetto to address some practical concerns as well as aesthetic ones, regarding sets and locations for the project. The two researched together extensively. “That’s what the adventure of cinema is all about,” says Bonetto. “You get a new script, and suddenly you’re thrust into a world that you know practically nothing about, and you’ve got to deal with it. It’s incredibly exciting. You start discovering, you start looking at everything, poring through piles of images until it’s coming out of your ears. I plunged, body and soul, into the 1914-18 War – which was particularly strange, since at that time our TV screens were showing images of a real war: the war in Iraq.”

As always, Bonetto's point of departure was archive documentation. "Aline and I have a simple way of working," says Jeunet. "We must have gone through just about every archive and looked at every image available on the war, including photos, newspapers and documentaries. It was a real gold mine."

"The greatest challenge was obviously the recreation of the front line and the trenches," says Bonetto. "This was because the set was less predictable. All the other sets were either outdoor constructions (and we know how to handle those) or studio constructions (we know how to do those too), but the trenches were another story. First we had to find the ideal place to recreate them. This couldn't be at the actual spots where the War took place – both because they're memorial sites and the ground had been too churned up to dig a set. Neither could it be on agricultural land – this would have made the land unusable for too long." After a lengthy scout, they chose a military terrain in the Poitiers area.

"Jean-Pierre needed a very specific set-up in the trenches," Bonetto continues, "so I tried to imagine how soldiers would move around and how many tunnels we'd need. I made sketches and reworked them with Jean-Pierre. Then we made a 7-meter long dummy. This had to be sufficiently large to allow us to detect all the technical problems that might crop up. Filming a trench is complex. It's narrow, deep and there are other difficulties, like water and mud. It would have to hold up for 5 weeks, in the rain. We couldn't risk the trenches collapsing on us, so we had to construct them according to very strict standards."

They worked for six weeks in this way, on 20 hectares (approximately 50 acres) of terrain, digging and equipping 200 meters of trenches. "Each square centimeter of these trenches was sculpted, painted, finely worked and polished. Then the no-man's land between the French and German lines had to be re-created. We dug shell craters, pulled up greenery and uprooted trees on the horizon line. The production crew replanted everything after the shoot. It was a real construction site, in every sense. When Jean-Pierre arrived and I saw him climb down into the trenches and walk up and down, not wanting to come out, it was a moving moment."

In a similar fashion, Jeunet worked closely with Madeline Fontaine on costumes. "Jean-Pierre's references are always visual and concrete," says Fontaine. "He gives a precise idea of the direction he wants to go in – then our work is to rise to his vision and do what's necessary to develop his images, his world and his characters. The challenge this time came from the fact that this production was much bigger (with more extras) and had to be very authentic – particularly since this was a pivotal period for fashion. Amélie was a more timeless, allegorical film; this film describes a specific epoch. At the same time, we had to get away from fixed and rigid historical reconstruction. It was all a matter of atmosphere and sensitivity."

For the big extras scenes – for example in the Place de l'Opera – the costume crew had to gather together almost 400 different costumes. These consisted of originals and copies found in France, England, and Spain. For the soldiers' uniforms, Fontaine soon realized she had to have them made. Two and half kilometers of sky-blue fabric were specially made up, to create 200 uniforms – of which each major actor had about 10. This allowed the uniforms to exhibit different stages of deterioration in the trenches.

Fontaine also took great care over the authenticity of Audrey Tautou's costumes. "We don't really know what social background she comes from, and we're in a transitional epoch, especially for women, who are in the process of letting go of many restrictions," she says. "This is obviously transforming their relationship to the body and the figure and giving them a greater sense of ease and freedom. We took all this into account, working closely with Audrey on Mathilde's appearance and figure, during the two months of preparation. She's a very sensitive, perceptive and intelligent person, who participates in your research and has a lot of respect for other people's work," she says.

"Jean-Pierre was often present while we were making the costumes, at least at the beginning," adds Fontaine. "He would drop in at the sewing studio, as though he wanted to immerse himself in what was happening there and in the raw materials and fabrics we'd found. It also helped him formulate a visual image in his mind."

Shooting took place between August 2003 and February 2004. Having begun with a few days involving a small crew in Corsica, it really took off in Paris and the Paris region. Later it moved to Brittany, then the Poitiers area for the trench scenes, ending in the Bry-Sur-Marne studios.

Throughout the five and a half months of shooting, Jeunet applied his usual working methods: painstaking preparation and very precise storyboards which he would even test out with a hand-held camera some days before the "real" shoot, to see if his intended frames and camera movements would actually work. "My way of preparing and anticipating everything still doesn't stop me changing it all at the last minute. Sometimes, I'll even provoke a surprise, to unsettle the actors. And when an actor makes a spontaneous suggestion, and we include it in the film, it makes me really happy."

Working with Tautou again, Jeunet still marvels at her discipline and growth as an actress. Says Jeunet, "She can do it all. Including the most difficult, subtle things. You may have noticed that sometimes, when you constantly repeat a word, in a continuous loop, it ends up losing its meaning – this is difficult to convey on screen. But Audrey can do it with no problem, in the same way she's able to express all levels of emotions. She'd already mastered technical precision and humor, and now she's mastered emotion. She's got it all."

In working with Jeunet again, the actress found they were as simpatico as ever. She remarks, "We're on the same wavelength. We can virtually read each other's minds. The shoot took place in an atmosphere of trust and mutual commitment...One of his great qualities is his knack for choosing actors. He only really directs his actors during run-throughs. Once he's got what he envisioned at the start, he doesn't need to give you a pile of indications on the set. He's someone who knows exactly where he's going. It's reassuring."

MANECH:

*I can hear her heart beating. It's like Morse code.
We're going to be married. I'm lucky we got sentenced, we won't have to wait for the end of the war. Now I'll go home after the execution....*

New to the experience of working with Jeunet, actor Gaspard Ulliel (Manech) quickly grew to appreciate the director's unique style and vision. Says Ulliel, "Jean-Pierre very quickly feels how far he can push his actors. This ability allows each of us to transcend to a certain level and surprise ourselves as well. For example, he can give an actor some direction by whispering in their ear without their partner hearing. It's often a very simple word or gesture. This little detail may seem insignificant, but paradoxically it makes all the difference."

For example, the director offered an unusual bit of advice for the scene where Elodie and Bastoche are in a restaurant after an awkward and emotionally-laden meeting. Explains Jérôme Kircher, who plays Bastoche, "Though he is extremely precise, Jean-Pierre lets the actor make suggestions. It's a pleasure to create together. He always finds a little way of directing that makes the difference. For [this scene] where my character, a carpenter, is with Elodie, he simply said to me, 'Imagine she is a block of wood that you want to sculpt.' With the help of this metaphor, I immediately understood what he was after."

Still, the film's scale presented many new challenges for the director. This was the first time he'd directed scenes with so many extras and so much action. "The most difficult thing was probably the combat and war scenes," he says. "This was mostly because we had to find extras who were both good actors and good stuntmen." It was no surprise that at the end of the day he insisted on meeting each and every one.

*And then, there was one shell too many,
one morning on the Buscourt front....*

One of the most intense periods of the shoot was the 7 weeks spent in the trenches. Everyone involved – actors, technicians and director – speak passionately about this. Jeunet made his principal actors read Les carnets de guerre de Louis Barthas, tonnelier. "It's an extremely interesting testimony because it's not romanticized, and it recounts with great lucidity not only the front line, but also the rearguard, along with the boredom and the daily drudgery," says the director.

Jeunet even prepared the extras for the shoot by giving them a collection of testimonies of daily life in the trenches, including letters from French soldiers and period photos. "This way," he explains, "when they got to the trenches, they had some idea of what it was like."

In creating the visual style of A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT, Jeunet worked closely with cinematographer and friend Bruno Delbonnel, with whom he had first worked 25 years ago in an animation studio. The film's delicate balance of the bleak life in the trenches contrasted with warmth of the images of Mathilde's faithful quest relied heavily on their collaboration.

"We had two major references for the film," says Delbonnel. "These were the late canvases of the Brazilian painter Juarez Machado, which Jean-Pierre adores, and Gordon Willis's work on the visual aspect of The Godfather. I'm referring to the warm, rather monochrome atmosphere with exploding splashes of color. However, we wanted to treat the trench sequences differently, using a harsher, more contrasted light. Jean-Pierre wanted us to smell the muddy earth, the wet tarpaulins...to feel the heaviness of the French soldiers' uniforms. So we worked to achieve a colder image, haunted by the sky-blue uniforms.” The director’s constant concern for fluidity and for movements conceived to look completely natural served as a unifying vision which, as Delbonnel says, “lends a very poetic note to the film.”

MATHILDE

*There’s something off-key in this...
I’m going to Paris tomorrow!*

In addition to all the physical aspects of the shoot, design elements as well as cinematographic concerns, the director resolved to take advantage of the latest in technology to recreate Paris between 1910 and 1920 as faithfully -- with his own, distinctly imaginative flourishes, of course -- as he endeavored to recreate the trenches of the 1914-18 War. Advances in digital technology made this ambitious undertaking possible. Nonetheless, it still required very close attention to detail during shooting and very painstaking preparation. The Duboi technicians, special effects experts, were on set almost all the time. Numerous scenes were shot in front of blue or green screens and it was even necessary, at times, to have surveyors on set to simplify the addition of different shots (real or entirely digitally created) onto the same image during post-production.

For example, to create the scene involving period road traffic in the Place de l’Opéra, the filmmakers first had to shoot the Place de l’Opéra as it is today, at a moment when it was deserted. Then on a huge open-air esplanade at an automobile test center, all the period vehicles and the extras in full costume were shot, milling about in every direction. Finally, in the studio, the last camera movement was shot, which ends up in the office of the detective Germain Pire. All these elements were then brought together and corrected.

“For this scene and other highly spectacular sequences (the promenade in front the Palais du Trocadéro, the exploding hot-air balloon, the floods, Paris’ Les Halles district), we’d done everything before the shoot, in computer-generated imagery,” says Alain Carsoux, visual effects designer at Duboi. Carsoux had worked with Jean-Pierre Jeunet, on The City of Lost Children. This 3-D previsualization allowed the director to spot problems in advance and anticipate the constraints of his set.

Mechanical special-effects people -- for pyrotechnic, climatic and mechanical effects -- were on the set during preparation of shots, as well, led by the Les Versaillais crew (Yves Domenjoud, Olivier Gleyze and Jean-Baptiste Bonetto), who have been working with Jeunet since before Delicatessen.

“The bar was set much higher in this film than in any of his previous ones,” says Yves Domenjoud. This was especially true of the trench and combat scenes, with explosions requiring over 400 kilos of explosives and rain sequences for which they had to simultaneously pipe water to the site and drain it off so the trenches would not become waterlogged. “Coming from the world of animation, Jean-Pierre was very interested in the special effects, whether on-the-spot or digital,” he continues. “He’s well aware of everybody’s contribution and knows exactly how to combine the two techniques.”

SYLVAIN

If you can't cry, you can talk...if you can't talk, don't say anything, but you know sometimes you talk and start crying...and then express more that way. You know what I mean? Or you can keep on being pig-headed!

With the added complexities of such an epic film, the post-production phase of the project promised to be an arduous process from the start. Anticipating the exactitude that would be required of the shoot, Jeunet had the film's editor Hervé Schneid with him on the set, setting up an editing room in a bus which traveled everywhere with the crew. Editing literally took place alongside the shooting. "When we hit a problem in a scene, we could evaluate it very quickly and adjust our sights," says the director. "This saved precious time and was a much more efficient way of working." Naturally, the digital special effects work would require additional time, but Jeunet and Delbonnel also devoted six weeks to calibrate the colors of the digital copy, in collaboration with colorist Yvan Lucas, which allowed them to perfect images and colors. Still, giving the film its finishing touches took over 6 months of post-production.

Sound engineer Gérard Hardy and his crew were equally passionate about perfecting the sound for the film. "My work consists of creating the film's entire soundscape from scratch. The difference this time was that for once Jean-Pierre's movie wasn't a fairytale, even a dark one. It was a realistic story. Before we could do anything; here, we had to take reality into account. Creating the contrast between the natural sounds (the sea off Brittany) and the sounds of war, which required a special crew, was really thrilling. We were obviously helped in our task by the obsessive on-set work of the sound engineer Jean Umansky, whose contribution was enormous. "We devoted 5 months to sound editing before mixing, which is quite rare for a French production," Hardy adds.

Mathilde is now nineteen. She plays the tuba because it sounds like a distress signal.

The final element for the film fell into place when Jeunet turned to acclaimed composer Angelo Badalamenti, who had written the soundtrack for The City of Lost Children, to provide the music for A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT. The composer recounts that one day he received a call from Jeunet, who simply said "Angelo, I've a movie for you. It's set in WWI, but that's not the subject. It's about the emotions of a young woman and her quest to find the love of her life and all the ups and downs that adventure entails."

Badalamenti continues, "Then he sent me a non-definitive version of the movie, which was enough for me to compose themes for the characters. In Mathilde's case, I was touched by her suffering, her beauty, her courage and her perseverance and created a theme based on a four-note pattern, which was very simple but which would move people." The recording sessions took place in June in Los Angeles, in the former MGM studios where The Jazz Singer, The Wizard of Oz and lots of other musicals had been shot.

“Badalamenti is a musician with style, and I love that,” says the director. “I love the music he wrote for the David Lynch films, like Lost Highway and Mulholland Drive. When we were editing the initial scenes, we’d put this music in, and it worked like a dream. His compositions, which are very lyrical and emotional -- yet simple -- just overwhelm me.”

In conclusion, Jeunet says “Everyone who worked on this film shared the same excitement, because it’s a visually ambitious film. The work was enormous, colossal and never, ever seemed to stop, for anyone. But it was a pleasure for all of us. An opportunity to work on a film like this doesn’t come along every day, in France. And we had total artistic freedom, regarding the script, the cast, the filming, post-production – everything.”

The director elaborates, “My colleagues on the film and myself are all more or less the same generation. We grew up together, started out together, worked like dogs together... Here we had the delightful feeling of being at the top of our game. If Amélie was an inspirational film, A VERY LONG ENGAGEMENT is a ripe, mature film. We’re all at the height of our powers, and we’ve got to take advantage of that quickly, before the decline that’s always lying in wait. In any case, despite the numerous difficulties, the entire adventure was a huge pleasure.”
